radio that the waves had come close to the building. Kuroda's home and clinic were spared, but just a couple of miles east, the tsunami and quake had caused major destruction.

"All I was trying to do was to prepare for the night and get heat," he says. "It was very cold. I tried to find some oil and batteries for the stove and candles. The electricity went out, so it was dark and hard for everyone to walk around. There were constant aftershocks, really strong ones. We all were very scared."

Kuroda says he couldn't reach fellow Rotarians at first. "Landline phones, cell phones, and e-mail were down for three days, We were completely isolated," he says. "In the hardest-hit areas, we don't know all the details of the damage. There are still Rotarians we haven't been able to contact yet."

Naoki Narayama, governor of District 2520, visited some of the affected villages soon after the earthquake. He fears that the death toll, already estimated at more than 12,000, will rise. But he is encouraged by the response of Rotarians.

"In this darkest hour, I have received numerous heartwarming messages from Rotarians all over the world," he says. "Their considerate inquiries and kind offers of helping hands have greatly encouraged us to tackle this daunting destruction."

Kuroda says Rotary clubs are doing what they can to support those affected by the disaster. "Despite the shortage of gasoline, many Rotarians are driving to deliver supplies to the areas most in need," he says. "We all, as Rotarians, are working together. I am deeply moved by what I'm seeing Rotarians do."

Japanese Rotarians witness devastation

“The earth seemed to be shaking forever, and it was so strong,” says RI Director Masahiro Kuroda. “I thought I was going to die.”

Kuroda, a physician, was seeing a patient on the second floor of his medical clinic in Hachinohe, Aomori, Japan, when a 9.0-magnitude earthquake off the country's northeast coast struck on 11 March.

“I escorted her downstairs. Holding each other's arms tightly, we walked down very slowly. After we reached the bottom floor, the earthquake stopped,” says Kuroda. “I led all the other patients outside and told them to go home, but she said she was too scared to leave and wanted to stay in the clinic. I didn't know what to say – she was so frightened. She left a couple of hours later and safely arrived home.”

The quake, the largest to hit Japan in recorded history, triggered a tsunami that swept six miles inland, destroying entire villages.

Kuroda and several staff members stayed at the clinic overnight after hearing on the
